What keeps weather where it belongs?

The Penrod Weather Strip Seal.

It's the weather strip seal that provides the important seal at the edge of a door, making solid contact between the door and the jamb when the door is closed.

Not only does the weather strip seal have to be strong, it has to be flexible. This elasticity is essential so that when the door is opened, its weather strip seal springs back, yet still creates a strong seal when the door is closed again. Without this elasticity, the weather strip will bend until it becomes ineffective, causing leaks along the side of the door and into the home.

Weather strip seal from Penrod creates a consistent compression every time a door is closed, providing a long-lasting seal for protection against air and water intrusion.

A CORNER PAD FOR YOUR IN-SWING ENTRY DOOR CAN DRAMATICALLY IMPROVE PERFORMANCE.

In fact, wind-driven water at the corner of a door system can cause water to flow up the interior panel of the weatherstrip channel, over the door sill and into your home.
